Siam's entry into the paper making field, as indicated by the recent shipment of a paper plast from this country to Bangkok for experiment with such raw materials as rice straw and native grasses is more characteris-tic of Siam's civilization than the white clephants or little boys smoking big cigars popularly associated with that Asiatic kingdom, says a bulletin from the Washington, D. Yet the Siamese woman wears the knee length panung, as does her brother, and for generations she has refused to be bothered with long hair. She has a freedom that has de-veloped a shrewdness and independence in contrast to most oriental women, though she is apt to be unlettered. From this park in the Royal Palace runs a boulevard with three roadways, set part by double rows of trees and flank-ed by shaded footpaths—an avenue which would do credit to the plan of an American city. Nor are Bangkok's many improvements due to foreign promotion, for there are fewer Europeans in Siam's capital than in almost any other Eastern city of its importance.
